It is a solid, two-story clapboard house in a thick stand of trees on a back road in Vermont. Only a few people in the area know of its existence, and even fewer know why at times it trembles violently when there is no wind, no shaking of the earth.

Many years ago a man named Jake Farr rented it. After a month or so, he went away and returned, bringing with him a wife. For some reason folks took a dislike to Sally Farr, with her dark gypsy hair and eyes, although she behaved herself, made quilts, raised a garden, canned fruits and vegetables and, in general, minded her own business. In time a girl, christened Molly, was born to the couple; and for sixteen years life in the Farr household was uneventful.

Suddenly Sally Farr hailed Jake into court for beating Molly. The judge granted Sally's request to put Molly in a school far away from Jake and his abuse.

From that moment on, Sally never spoke another word to Jake. She kept his house, but lived in a room to herself, and her eyes were always filled with hate.

Their nearest neighbor, who shall be called Mrs. Walters, lived across the hill. One night her house caught fire. In that lonely back country there was no chance to save the house. It burned to the ground.

Sally Farr walked over to offer Mrs. Walters shelter until she could get her house rebuilt, but Mrs. Walters stayed with the Farrs only three days.

"I could not bear it," she told one of her friends. "There's fear in that house . . . horrible, hair-raising fear. Sally leaves little notes around for Jake to find. Like 'Get arsenic for currant bugs. Give in oatmeal.' and 'Buy rat poison.' "

Jake began to lose weight, obviously he was afraid to eat anything Sally cooked. He began to drink heavily and to look as if the devil rode on his shoulder.

One evening Mrs. Walters was scrounging through the ruins of her home when she heard Jake Farr screaming. She hurried over to find him standing in his front door, holding a shotgun.

"She tried to kill me!" he shrieked. "She did it before. If ever she enters this house again, I'll kill her!"

The next day Jake swore to a complaint against Sally, but she had disappeared. For several days the sheriff looked for her unsuccessfully and finally decided she had left the country. However, she apparently had not, for strange things began to happen at the Farr farm. One night all the currant bushes were destroyed; then, Jake's dog was poisoned; and one evening someone fired a shot through a window, and it tore the paper that Jake was reading at the time.

Why Jake did not abandon the house, no one knew. He went no place without his gun, and several people reported seeing Sally in the woods carrying a long-barreled rifle. It was obvious they were gunning for each other.

One afternoon Tom Burns, a thirteen-year-old, was returning from gathering pine cones when he saw Jake in the doorway of his house. Raising his gun, Jake fired across the road toward a little gully. Just then another shot rang out. Tom whirled around. A woman stood on the far side of the gully, a smoking rifle in her hands, and Jake Farr lay dead on his own doorstep.

From Tom's description the woman could have been no one but Sally Farr. However, in the forty odd years that have passed since that day, Sally Farr has never been heard of or seen . . . in the flesh, that is. But many people have seen her standing in her dark gray cloak, eyes burning with hatred, staring from the far side of the gully at the deserted clapboard house. And many more have seen the house, solid as it is, shake from cellar to rooftree when there is no wind, no trembling of the earth. It shakes, they say, with fear as did Jake Farr.
